The dullahan waits, a question hanging in the air. How, exactly, can you prove you didn't take it?

There's only one way, of course. To prove your innocence, you must prove someone else's guilt. With a sinking feeling in your stomach, you force the bitter words out of your mouth.

You will help him find the thief.

Though his movements are subtle, some of the tension leaves the dullahan's shoulders and stance. You sense he is surprised and at least considering your proposal. On the one hand, you dread his acceptance—but on the other hand, it does seem to be your only chance to survive this encounter.

Perhaps a little additional convincing is in order? What might make your assistance valuable to the dullahan?

- My courage is unequalled. I will neither flee nor falter till my quest is complete.
- Deadly or not, this creature is clearly hurt by his loss. What is a dullahan without his head? I have no ulterior motives; I only want to help.
- For the right price, I am capable of anything. Even recovering a stolen head.
- I'll do anything he wants as long as he doesn't kill me! I will do his bidding without question, I swear!
- What happened to this creature, regardless of his nature, is wrong. My intentions are
